Kate Hutchinson, theguardian.com:

Grohl is still the ever-charismatic frontman, feeding the crowd lines between songs about having a party, how the crowd are "fucking beautiful", and, of how they want to carry on playing a little longer and their audience should stay till the bitter end, "I understand that the EDM tent is going to be full..." It's as if he hasn't clocked that they are part of the same commercial coin. But perhaps there's hope yet. New song Run from forthcoming ninth album Concrete and Gold takes a surprisingly gnarly turn, with a bassline that ploughs sexy new depths and luxuriates in some major fretwork in the breakdown, as if Grohl is channeling Led Zeppelin and Queens of the Stone Age.

Their vintage songs are the ones that still hit hardest - and those are not just the words of a nostalgia bore. They dedicate closing track Everlong to "Laura" - presumably Laura Plane, a teacher from Devon, a lifelong Foos fan who recently died after a cancer battle and whose husband Grohl had reached out to. As the fireworks fizz in the background, it's a reminder of the true emotional pull the band can have.

Meanwhile, Foo Fighters frontman Dave Grohl has beaten Adele's record for the most swear words used in a Glastonbury headline performance. According to the NME, Grohl told the crowd: "We were doing an interview and someone said, 'you know you're not supposed to swear - there's no swearing on Glastonbury'. I was like, what the f is that supposed to fing mean? And then I guess, Adele holds the record for the most fs in a Glastonbury appearance. Now I love Adele, but guess what?" After chanted the F-word with the audience for a while, he added: "OK, I think we broke her record - I heard it was 33." However the crowd pressed him further to go beyond the record and Grohl responded: "Dude, shut the f up! That's 34!"
